

Start-Up Co-Founders Wanted
Software Development
Disrupt the Graduate Recruitment Process

Looking to join a start-up where you can apply your software development skills for a global application? Are you ready to disrupt the graduate recruitment process? Then consider being a co-founder working alongside an industry expert to bring the application to market.

The present graduate recruitment process is highly inefficient for both students and employers. It leads to wasted resources and sub-optimum outcomes. With deep domain knowledge, Peter Pychtin has developed a digital platform using digitised data and algorithms to better match students and employers. It's been tested with real data with positive feedback from employers.

To bring the product to market, I'm seeking developers who are passionate about changing graduate recruitment. You will provide the technical expertise – coding, UX / UI and database development. If you want to be part of something big, this is your chance to be a co-founder. This is not a paid position but will include equity participation.

To be considered you will be:

- Excited and passionate about transforming graduate recruitment
- Committed to devote a minimum of 10 hours per week
- Experienced within or across full stack development for web applications
- Experience with mobile development (optional)
- Ready to reach out to other resources for technical support when/if needed
- In for the long-term

As a co-founder / developer you will:

- Work on a platform and algorithm already designed and tested
- Gain commercial insights working with a senior business executive
- Use a hosted server environment

The intent is to take the beta product to market for commercial use in late 2017. Then secure investor seed funding to expand and develop the product further.

Being a co-founder is a big step. It requires both parties getting to know, trust and be confident with each other.

I am open to the number of co-founders and I am open to international or local students.
